

This Month – NW Fred Hill Run 9th February

This used to be the River Ribble

End of the road - Sawley Abbey

It wasn't the best-timed event we've ever held but we didn't let it beat us. This year we were joined by Storm Ciara, who made it a bit difficult for many to even reach us. We rode into the teeth of a gale and much of our route was flooded out. Luckily it didn't reach above the sparkplugs. As you can imagine, it was a hoot. The fact that Yorkshire decided to cancel their run only made it sweeter. A big thanks to all who made the run (or tried their best but got driven back).

Next Month – Manchester Bike Show – 28-29th March

Almost time again for the Event City bike show and MAG will be there as usual. It's great that we have a decent bike show in the region and it's definitely worth supporting. The MAG stand will be staffed exclusively by NW volunteers, all eager to help - so swing by for a natter as you're passing. The price is still £18 on the door (£15 off if you're over 65), and a fiver for kids. Discounted advance tickets are £3 less if you buy in advance online. Parking is free for cars or bikes.

Many duped into buying fake insurance on social media

Thousands of motorists are driving without insurance after falling for multimillion-pound scams being promoted on Google, Instagram and Twitter. Britain's biggest insurance companies have warned that unwitting motorists are taking out cheap car cover from rogue firms that is invalid or does not exist. The scams could leave other road users at risk and are estimated to push up premiums by £50 for every one insured, insurers say. They are now calling for tougher web advertising laws to tackle the problem.

The scale of the epidemic is not known as road users with fake insurance can go undetected for months. However, Aviva, Britain's largest insurer, detected 3,100 insurance applications linked to fake policies last year and is investigating a further 4,000. The company said that this was just the tip of the iceberg. Fraud investigators for the industry launched more than 2,300 cases last year, with victims losing £1,209 on average, according to police. Direct Line, another big insurer, has removed 500 fake insurance adverts in the past six months.

Ben Fletcher, director of the Insurance Fraud Bureau, said:

"The full scale of this problem is unknown. This activity is largely under-reported as many people fail to realise that they are being confronted with spoof online ads."

The scam typically snares those who search for cheap insurance using the internet. They either find adverts that pop up on Google, or are targeted by adverts on social media such as Instagram and Twitter. The adverts appear to be for genuine firms that operate as insurance brokers, selling policies from well-known companies. For this reason the scam is known as "ghost broking". When they take out the policy, they receive documents that look like the real thing. However the policy either does not exist, or has been registered to another part of the country that has very low-cost insurance. Those with the fake policies could receive a criminal conviction, have their vehicle impounded or have points on their licence. Police have secured an average of 81 convictions a year since 2006. In 2018, a 27-year-old ghost broker from Oldham was jailed over a £321,000 scam.

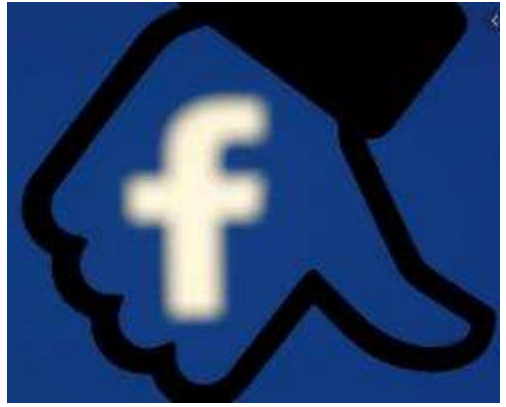

Unregulated claims management firms are also paying Google to appear at the top of searches. Representatives only reveal they are not part of genuine insurers when specifically asked. Insurers warn the claims managers can cost consumers hundreds of thousands of pounds when applications handled by them go wrong.

Last month Andrew Bailey, head of the Financial Conduct Authority, had called for web scams to be added to online harms legislation. Aviva said: "We agree that legislation is needed to protect consumers from the growing risk of financial harm generated online."

Facebook, which owns Instagram, said it does not tolerate fraudulent activity on its platforms, adding that it uses people and technology to remove harmful content. Twitter said: "We take strong enforcement action on accounts that are in violation of our dedicated financial scams policy." Google said it ensures its adverts are "from reputable organisations offering genuine services" and that it takes "immediate action to prevent misrepresentative ads". It said it has a tool for anyone to report misleading adverts.

How not to get caught out

- If it looks too good to be true, it probably is.
- Insurance brokers are regulated by the Financial Conduct Authority, so they should be registered here: register.fca.org.uk
- Always use the official website of a reputable firm or comparison website when buying insurance or making a claim.
- Avoid policies sold via social media, or those advertised in motor repair shops, pubs and newsagents.

Surveillance camera fears over green number plates

The introduction of green numberplates for electric cars is likely to lead to far more surveillance cameras on roads, ministers have been warned.

A government watchdog said that the proposal from the Department for Transport would have serious privacy implications and may even be illegal. The Surveillance Camera Commissioner, which regulates the use of CCTV and similar technology, said there was "limited evidence" that the new plates were wanted or would provide benefits to society.

It raises questions over the plans that were unveiled by the DfT last year in a move to encourage the purchase of zero-emission vehicles — pure electric and hydrogen vehicles. A consultation published last autumn said that green plates would "enable people to spot and differentiate vehicles based on their environmental impact", helping to "normalise the idea of clean vehicles on our roads". Councils would be encouraged to give green plate holders "local incentives" including the ability to drive in bus lanes, access electric charging parking bays and free use of car parks. The document said that enforcement of the scheme "would likely be by the local authority reading vehicle plates" through automatic numberplate recognition (ANPR). The technology is already used by councils to monitor bus lanes, yellow box junctions and car parks. There are also an estimated 9,000 cameras used by police forces.

Under the proposals, numberplates for the cleanest vehicles would keep the traditional black-on-yellow design but a green stripe would appear on the left-hand side to mark them out. It said that a full green numberplate with black lettering would be difficult to read by ANPR camera. In its formal response to the DfT consultation, the Surveillance Camera Commissioner said it was concerned that green numberplates would trigger "an unqualified extension to the role of ANPR" on the road network, which may be illegal.

"Where is the evidence to prove that the extension to the ANPR function is justified?" the response said. "Limited evidence was presented that car drivers want green numberplates or that it is for the benefit of society. Therefore, the legality was questioned."

The response also warned of a possible increase in criminals attempting to clone plates to secure access to benefits such as driving in bus lanes.

"This leads to a greater risk to the national ANPR system regarding the potential of more cloned plates on the road," it said. "The process of getting green numberplates should therefore be tightly controlled."

It said that views had been taken from the ANPR "independent advisory group" — a panel chaired by the commissioner which includes representatives from the Home Office, police forces and the Information Commissioner's Office — to draft the response.

The DfT consultation closed last month. Plans are expected to be announced late this year, with the likelihood that legislation will be needed to bring in the green plate scheme. A DfT spokeswoman said: "Green numberplates are a positive and exciting way to raise awareness and support the uptake of electric vehicles on our roads. The public consultation has now closed and we are analysing responses."
